

This summer I went to Japan with my mother. It was my first time visiting this country and I was very excited about it. My first impression of Japan was that most people there are law-abiding and the streets are extremely clean without any garbage.

Take Moerenuma Park as an example, it is located in Hokkaido of Japan and I was astonished by its breathtaking scenery. I've never been to such a picturesque park before! There are green hills, crystal clear lakes and lots of art buildings which could be enjoyed as a fusion of art and nature.

The different culture that I learned from this journey was the amazing working attitude of Japanese people. Most of the shop owners, waiters and clerks I met there were so polite, meticulous and have a good work ethic. However, what impressed me most of all was a girl who sells beer in the Sapporo Dome in Hokkaido, where my mother and I watched a live baseball game for the first time in our lives.

The girl in this photo was a waitress in the field. If you order the beer, she would kneel down immediately, fill the beer mug and deliver to you with a charming smile on her face. If you look a little closer, you'll find that she was carrying a heavy beer keg on her back. I wonder how heavy that could be! During the game, whenever she goes to the lowest part of the seating area, she always stoops and bows to the audience before she moves upward. For most Japanese audience, the beer girl was just doing her job appropriately as expected. However, both my mother and I were amazed. In my opinion, if you are accustomed to hardworking, your potential can be activated. I think this attitude is worth learning for anyone who wants to be professional in his field. This was indeed an unforgettable experience to me.
